Meridian Complex Meridian Complexes are combinations of plant, animal and mineral substances that have an influence upon the energy flow within the acupuncture meridians. Traditional Chinese acupuncture defines illness as an excess or deficiency of energy within a meridian. The main effect of these complexes is release and regulation of blocked energy circulation within the acupuncture meridians. Organs and meridians are closely related. The energetics of the meridians effect specific neurological reflexes before having a final effect on the organ. Put another way, the neurological system acts as a switching substation for energy transferred to specific end organs.

The acupunctureÂ pulses are a direct electrical reflection of the status of theÂ neurological switching control system of each organ. Making a change in the energetics of the meridian is reflected in theÂ neurological switching control system (substation) and in the end organ system. This phenomenom gives us the pulses and other acupuncture points for diagnoses as well as measuring points for effectiveness of treatment.

An adequate flow of energy is necessary for healing. These meridian complexes can be used to alter acupuncture meridian energies effecting both the neurological substations and the end organs of the meridian.
